The essential asset for individuals and nations to achieve a sustained recovery is the willingness of each to strive to be better informed, better equipped, and ready to forge pathways to a higher quality of life. Education is a first step toward the proper setting to achieve these goals.

But nations have a broader role to play in the twenty-first century because the world is older, new technologies abound, and the interdependence of nations and their peoples have become more constrictive. Fiscal, monetary, and regulatory policy instruments of the national and supra-natural authorities used to accomplish specific goals, as discussed in Recovery Sustained, need revamping and/or new additions to achieve the required tasks.

Nonetheless, the determination of the relative scope and scale of the chosen activities should rest effectively with the people. Nations and the people in them differ from each other in ways that are beneficial to human progress.
